Lord Denning On Due Process

That is how Denning described the news of his brothers' deaths in his book, "The Due Process of Law." They had been killed in the war. Jack, the eldest, died leading his men at Flanders. The other, Gordon, a sailor, was killed in the Battle of Jutland, aged 19. He further wrote, "...Jack and Gordon—they were the best of us..."

The 'golden thread' of his argument (to borrow the phrase Lord Simon used to describe the accused's benefit of the doubt in criminal cases) is that, if left to themselves, the courts can, under Lord Denning's kindly tutelage, solve the problems and do justice. He has a good case, as Due Process shows. His name will always be associated with the development of judicial remedies to control the post-war proliferation of government agencies, central and local, which have been imposed ...

This chapter discusses many important developments in the law of contempt of court. Previously to the events discussed in this chapter there had been no recourse to the Court of Appeal. All the decisions were by courts of the first instance. It was only in 1960 that an appeal was first given. So it has been the function of the Court of Appeal to enunciate the principles — save for one case ...
